We examined the occurrence of autonomic disorders in a group of adults with mild to moderate intellectual disabilities, with no known neurological problems or signs of psychiatric illness, and examined the underlying aetiologies. The subjects consisted of 31 individuals (25 men, 6 women), with a mean age of 25 years (range 18-38 years). They were all residents of a psychiatric institution in a Swiss city. All had a DSM-IV diagnosis of a pervasive developmental disorder (PDD), including Asperger syndrome (n = 25), autistic disorder (n = 4), or mixed Asperger and autistic disorder (n = 2). Autonomic disorders, scored according to the Adult Dysautonomia Rating Scale (ADRS), were frequent (21/31, 67%). Half of these individuals had a cluster of more than two disorders, and the most common disorders were attention-deficit/hyperactivity disorder (ADHD) and cardiac arrhythmia. Psychopharmacological treatment was reported for only 10 individuals (32%), and a marked improvement in autonomic function was reported by only 7 (24%). Autonomic disorders were frequent in the present cohort of adults with mild to moderate intellectual disabilities, and the most common disorder was ADHD, which is in contrast to reports from young adults with autism. It seems that the pathophysiology of AD in adults with PDD is quite different from that of AD in children and adults with autism.The more I use my fast-drying airbrush technique, the more and more I wonder, "How does that look?"
